The Conference of Law Library Educators is a group formed to gather together law librarians and others attending the AALL Annual Meeting who teach or are interested in teaching law librarianship courses in Masters programs in graduate schools of information and library science. We have no officers or bylaws, as this is a casual group that shares information about the education of law librarians. As in past years, the Conference met in Boston to share news of our programs, courses, students, graduates, and other updates of interest. The Conference has a Community hosted on the AALL website, and a website for the group hosted by the University of Washington (http://lib.law.washington.edu/colle/) which includes meeting minutes and resources for law librarians teaching in library and information school programs.

This year a Bloomberg Law representative came to the meeting, and we hope that this new full-service legal information company will offer access to its databases to students in legal research and law librarianship courses as Westlaw and LexisNexis have done for years. When details are known, they will be posted on the COLLE website noted above.
